Having been involved in several incidents of domestic violence against my daughter by a "live-in", I am 100% for the proposed change that would allow juries to weigh past acts of domestic violence in deliberations. Even if the charges have been dropped by the victim after the violator sobers up and sweet talks her into coming back, I still think these acts, in themselves, are enough to be an issue as to the capabilities of violent acts on the part of the violator. It has been my experience that most of these violators never change and are a threat for the future and therefore all past and current acts should be weighed by the juries in determining fault and punishment due. Thanks for listening.
